Aéroports de Paris Ingénierie: Olivier Berger appointed CEO

As proposed by ADP Ingénierie's Board of Directors on 8 October, Olivier Berger has been appointed CEO of ADPI.

Olivier Berger, 50 years old, is a qualified engineer from the École Polytechnique et des Ponts-et-Chaussée. For more than ten years, he managed large-scale infrastructural projects before working in subsidiaries abroad. Since 2002, he has been managing engineering offices all over the world for large industrial companies (Alstom, GDF, and Suez) and ensuring their successful strategic development. Since January 2015, Olivier Berger has been the Chief Operating Officer for ADP Ingénierie, replacing Guillaume Sauvé.

About ADP Ingénierie:

A wholly owned subsidiary of Aéroports de Paris, ADP Ingénierie (ADPI) is a French engineering company which is involved, on an international level, in architectural activities, major regeneration projects (airports and urban expansion) and complex building projects (airport terminals, stadiums, high-rise towers, theatres, etc.). ADP Ingénierie also offers services in consultancy, project management and project management support. Its teams work on projects from the initial design stages until completion. ADP Ingénierie brings together a multiplicity of skills with its engineers, architects, design specialists and construction supervisors. Formed in 2000, ADP Ingénierie is currently managing over 165 projects worldwide.
